PREAMBLE

Geoparks as territories are important not only from the viewpoint of geological (abiotic nature) and biological (living nature) research, but also from the perspective of archaeology, mining geology, culture, history, and ethnographic specificity and diversity (the cultural component of the land).

They are established in line with the sustainable development strategy, offer research potential, help promote environmentalism, and facilitate education. Geoparks support local development in terms of new economic and cultural regional activities (nature-friendly and sustainable tourism) and simultaneously help protect and conserve geodiversity and biodiversity.

In order to establish cooperation and exchange experience in the area of Geopark establishment, operation, and development, the Participants to the Memorandum have decided to conclude this Memorandum.
